The NYPD's controversial racial profiling program Stop & Frisk combined with ICE's federal deportation program "Secure Communities" (S-Comm) puts our communities at increased risk of detention and deportation. Over 400,000 people, a record number, were exiled from U.S. last year and S-Comm played a key role.

S-Comm went live in NYC in May 2012. Under S-Comm, police send fingerprints of arrestees to the Department of Homeland Security database. This allows Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) to rapidly identify potential deportees, and then transfer these people directly into the detention and deportation system, separating them from their families and communities. Locked up in detention centers in remote locations, immigrants have severely limited access to lawyers, medical care, family, witnesses, and evidence to defend against deportation.
